World Day Against Trafficking in Persons is celebrated annually on July 30. Alas, it will be utopic to commemorate the Day of Ending Human Trafficking one day.

Zeynal Hajiev

Human trafficking is a crime that should cease to exist. Nobody deserves to be a victim of human trafficking. But we also understand that this is a business-based crime. According to the UN Secretary General's report of 7 September 2020, human trafficking generates approximately $150 billion in global profits for traffickers a year, $99 billion of which comes from commercial sexual exploitation.

Dushanbe, July 30, 2021

The U.S. Embassy's International Narcotics and Law Enforcement (INL) office supported the "Victims' Voices Lead the Way" roundtable, dedicated to the "World Day Against Trafficking in Persons." The International Organization for Migration (IOM), INL's implementing partner, conducted the roundtable to emphasize the necessity of a victims-centered approach in combating human trafficking (TIP). The roundtable highlighted the importance of listening to and learning from survivors of human trafficking.

INL Director Sita Farrell noted that many victims of human trafficking had experienced ignorance or misunderstandings in their attempts to obtain help. Some have also faced traumatic post-rescue experiences during identification interviews and legal proceedings, revictimization, or punishment for crimes that their traffickers forced them to commit. Others have been stigmatized or have not been adequately supported.

In 2021, INL financially supported IOM's counter-trafficking project to bolster Tajik authorities' skills and resources further to prevent, identify, and prosecute this crime, allowing survivors of TIP to be key actors in the fight against human trafficking. This project will strengthen coordination and provide training and materials to vulnerable groups such as migrants, victims of domestic violence, unemployed persons, young girls, and uneducated women. They will learn about the risks of TIP, methods of recruitment and coercion, preventative measures, and where to refer cases.
